Dear Dr. Daly:

I have followed the investigative career of Paul McHenry since 1967. He is a careful, thoughtful, conscientious, original and productive investigator and physician. Others can better evaluate his clinical and teaching contributions but there is no question about the effectiveness of his research effort. His unique contributions have been in the measurement and automation of stress responses in the ECG, but he has brought a solid base to researches in several other aspects of cardiology. He understands problems, poses good questions and effectively implements studies.

I would predict a long and stable career as an effective all-round physician and would have no problem, from this distance, in supporting the application for his promotion to Professor.

Sincerely,

Henry Blackburn, M.D.
Professor and Director, and
Professor of Medicine
