

He had been dean of the School of Public Health since it opened in 1968. When it first opened, it was operating in rented quarters in the Anderson-Mayfair Hotel and in the Hermann Professional Building. With an anticipated enrollment of 25 students, the school hoped to offer a master's program at best.

Eighteen years later, the school offers master of science, master of public health, doctor of public health and doctor of philosophy programs in areas ranging from community health to aerospace medicine. The school has gained national and international prominence.

Stallones received his medical degree in 1949 from Western Reserve University and worked in preventive medicine most of his career. He taught at the University of California at Berkeley before coming to Texas.

He received his master's degree in public health in 1952 from Berkeley.

Stallones was a fellow of the American Public Health Association and the American College of Preventive Medicine and a member of numerous other professional organizations.

He was elected to membership in the Institute of Medicine, a part of the National Academy of Sciences that examines public policy regarding health and advises the federal government of its findings.

Survivors include two daughters, Jorel Thomson of Menlo Park, Calif., and Dr. Lorann Nuckols of Lexington, Ky.; a son, Jared of Austin; his mother, Mrs. Jet Toole, and a brother, Arlen, both of Twin Falls, Idaho; a sister, Eloise Malan of South Africa; and four grandchildren.