Dear Bob and Betty:

WISSEN

not

You'll have a hard time wading through the ponderous excesses of Henry Miller, but you'll see the sections I have bracketed. I think they tell a marvelous story of people and bread. I was so impressed by the analogy that I suggested to Art Buchwald that it be continued showing how the change in the character of a bread might represent the change in character of a people. French bread is now made in commercial molds and is light, fluffy and without character. America now has much diversity in its breads and even a great deal of character. So, there can be progress and decadence represented in change in bread. Buchwald didn't respond to my idea. Neither did he like my idea of making something of an anagram of his name and writing a medical column in the same satirical vein as his columns, called "Butch Artzwald, MD". I never formally asked him for permission to do this, since my imagination dried up after the first column.

We are grateful for our two great visits with you, and hope for many more.

Regards,

Henry and Stacy
